BOYNE BRIDGE GONE Sandy Row opposition not enough to save historic landmark from wrecking ball

BY CONOR MCPARLAND

THE historic Boyne Bridge in South Belfast has finally been demolished after delays caused by passionate local opposition and planning The bridge finally faded into the history books this week as work continues apace on road developments connected to the adjacent new Grand Central Station. Translink has promised that significant parts of the structure of the bridge – an important part of Orange culture given its links to King William – will be retained for future heritage projects. The work is due to be completed by the end of the year. See story, page 3
